DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (If known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The original front portion of the Old Mansion is a one and one-half story brick structure with dormers and a jerkin head roof with exterior chimneys. The brick in the water table is English bond, and above, Flemish bond with glazed headers. The nine over nine pane windows have flat, rubbed brick arches, whereas the basement windows have segmental arches. The narrow dormer features hipped roofs. A later front porch obscures the first floor facade of the house. The frame addition, added to the rear of the house in the mid-eighteenth century, is covered by a gambrel roof with shed dormers. The addition, like the main part of the house, has a modillioned cornice.

Except for the removal of two partitions and a mantel, virtually all of the original interior features remain. The woodwork is, however, quite simple.

Although never restored, the house is in a good state of preservation.

O. STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE.

Built circa 1670 on a 17,000 acre land grant, the Old Mansion was originally called Bowling Green, taking its name from the large bowling green on the lawn. The name was changed to the Old Mansion when Major John Hoomes, the first owner, donated land for a courthouse and other public buildings, giving the name of his estate to the town. The house had a race track around the lawn and became widely known for its stables.

Among those entertained at the Old Mansion were General George Washington and some of his troops who camped on the lawn, as well as Lafayette who was honored at a banquet after the victory at Yorktown.

Architecturally significant as one of the best preserved seventeenth century houses in the state, the Old Mansion is also of historical interest, having served as an important social center for the area in the late-eighteenth century.
